HELP AND ADVICE

- Depression and anxiety are the most common mental health conditions in pregnancy.
- Women who are unwell during their pregnancy:
  - May not be able to take good care of themselves
  - May not attend their antenatal appointments meaning that they may miss out on important care. This can increase the risk of pregnancy-related complications.
  - May remain unwell after birth which can affect their relationship with their baby and make it more difficult to care for them.
- Women with existing or previous mental health problems are more likely to become unwell during pregnancy or within the first year of birth.
- This is more common in women who have had severe mental health problems (e.g. schizophrenia, post natal depression, severe depression, Obsessive Compulsive Disorder (OCD) or an eating disorder).
- Women who have had a serious mental illness or who have received treatment from mental health services previously should be encouraged to accept the offer of a referral to a specialist during pregnancy, even if they feel well.
- Some women with a mental health problem stop taking their medication during pregnancy due to fears about the effect on their baby. Women should discuss any concerns with their midwife or GP as stopping their medication suddenly may cause their mental health condition to return or deteriorate which can have a negative impact on their baby. The GP or midwife can help them understand the advantages and disadvantages of taking medication.
- Post natal depression usually begins within the first 6 months of giving birth. If left untreated it can last for more than a year. Recovery is better when it is identified and treated earlier.

PERINATAL MENTAL HEALTH

- 'Baby blues' make women feel low and tearful. They normally occur during the first week after birth and are caused by hormonal changes.
- Talking therapies can be useful for some mental health problems in pregnancy. In some cases, these can be used instead of or alongside medication.
